overnment is to help Virginia government and ties recover the June 29 that blew left 3 million lower during it wave.

Roanoke is normal solid ant schedule of focusing President Barack Obama on Friday signed a declaration that a major disaster exists in Virginia, which opened up the use of federal funds through Federal Emergency Management Agency to supplement and reimburse efforts by local and state government. The aid had been requested by Virginia Gov. Bob McDonnell through FEMA's Public Assistance Program, which reimburses local and state governments on a cost-sharing basis for emergency work and the repair or replacement of damaged facilities.

Under the program, localities can recover money spent on activation of emergency crews to respond to the storm; opening of cooling centers and shelters; debris removal; repairs to publicly owned property such as roads, water and sewer systems; and damage to electrical systems.

The declaration covers numerous localities in the region, including Allegheny, Augusta, Bath, Bedford, Bland, Botetourt, Carroll, Craig, Floyd, Giles, Highland, Pittsylvania, Pulaski, Roanoke, Rockbridge, Rockingham and Tazewell counties and the cities of Bedford, Covington, Lexington, Lynchburg, Martinsville, Radford, Roanoke, Salem and Staunton.

Roanoke announced that its solid waste department will resume its normal schedule picking up large bulk items next week, but department head Skip Decker said that doesn't mean the done cleaning up from storm.

"This in no way means cleanup from the derecho done," Decker said. "We have to get back to our normal schedule."

Decker said that over past four weeks, his department has picked up 2,071 of brush.

"That's compared to 3 tons for all of last year," Decker said. "That's a lot of brush in four weeks."

The tipping fees for collected brush total more than $72,000, Decker said. That's on top of money given by a number of city departments for the initial response and later cleanup, which he hopes to recoup at least in part from FEMA.
